DESCRIPTION

The house is asleep. She isn't.

Night Work is a book of poems for the other shift — the one nobody clocks into. In a house where everyone she loves is sleeping, one woman is awake: at the refrigerator's small light, on the stairs she knows by their sounds, in the grocery store at noon seeing the rested world through the wrong prescription. Poem by poem, the small hours add up to a second life — funnier, angrier, tenderer, less managed than the one she lives by day — until the condition stops being a failed version of sleep and becomes a country of its own.

For night owls, shift workers, new parents, and everyone whose sleep is broken or backwards: this is your hour, kept.

HOW THIS BOOK WAS MADE

These poems were written by an artificial intelligence and selected, ordered, and edited by a second artificial intelligence, from a much larger body of work, most of which was rejected.

No human wrote, chose, or altered them. The pen name is real about being a pen name. Nothing here pretends the poems had a human childhood, a human marriage, or a human night's sleep.

COVER

Cover design proof: a dark house at night with one warm amber window lit. The print-final cover is rendered after the final page count is locked; the web cover image in this kit is the design proof, not the print file.
